Introduction

The Publication Manual of the American Psychological Association (Publication Manual) is the most frequently used style guide for scholars writing papers in the social and behavioral sciences. Although undergraduates are often asked to use APA style to format their papers, it's designed primarily for formatting papers published in scholarly journals and covers only some resources for students. For that reason, your instructor, not the Publication Manual, is the best resource for formatting a table of contents, PowerPoint slides, or other course-specific content. Below, you'll find specific rules for use of APA documentation according to the seventh edition of the Publication Manual. Additionally, the APA website offers Style and Grammar Guidelines, an overview on formatting papers, citing sources, using stylistic mechanics, and avoiding plagiarism in accordance with APA style.

For help with other documentation styles, please see our other lessons in the Smarthinking Writer's Handbook: MLA Style, Chicago/Turabian Style, or Harvard Style.

Formatting Your Document Using APA Guidelines

There are a few conventions to observe when formatting your paper following APA guidelines. However, if your school has its own specific formatting guidelines, they take precedence over anything written here or in the Publication Manual.

Title Page

In the 7th edition, APA (2020) provides guidelines for student title pages and professional title pages. The following insight corresponds to guidelines for student title pages; refer to the APA website for information on formatting a professional title page.

Double-space the text on the title page. Include the following elements, each on its own line:

- the page number at the top right corner of the title page—usually, only the number is needed
 - page 1 will show up as 1, not pg. 1 or p. 1; check with your school since some schools require numbering preliminary pages using lowercase Roman numerals (e.g., i, ii, iii)
- the title of the paper, bold and centered, three to four lines from the top of the page
- your name (first, middle initial, and last) and the names of any coauthors, listed in order based on their levels of contribution
 - insert one extra double-spaced line below the title and before the author(s)
 - separate two authors' names with the word and
 - separate three or more authors' names by including a comma between each name as well as the word and after the comma that is between the last two names
- your affiliation, including the department under which the paper is written and the name of the institution or school; separate these two elements with a comma
- the course number as seen on your course materials and the full course name; separate these two elements with a colon
- the instructor's name as written on course materials
- the due date for the paper or project

See this example of a student title page for a visual representation of these guidelines.

Order of Pages

In APA style, you should follow a specific order for the pages of a paper. If your paper doesn't include or need one of the following components, you can simply skip it and move on to the next. Start each component on its own new page.

- Title page as the first page
- Abstract
- Text
- References

Additional components may include footnotes, tables, figures, and/or appendices. If using footnotes, start these on a new page after the reference list. Alternatively, you may place footnotes in the footer section of the page where they're mentioned in the text. Tables and figures may be placed in the text or, if you prefer, after the page for footnotes if you're using them. If you don't use footnotes, a page for tables may be placed after the reference list. If including tables, figures, or appendices at the end of your paper, place each on its own new page, in this order: tables, figures, appendices.

Abstract

To see details on how to write an abstract, refer to the Smarthinking Writer's Handbook lesson on abstracts. Abstracts are not generally required for student essay submissions. If your assignment requires an abstract, a few basic guidelines will help you get started:

- Follow requirements specific to your school or your instructor's requests
- Write no more than 250 words
- Explain the central issue or problem without evaluation
- Summarize the whole paper briefly, focusing on its basic points and characteristics
- State your main conclusions or findings

The abstract is different from an introduction, which states the research problem and its significance, summarizes relevant background and related research, and explains what new contribution the paper will offer. If you include an abstract, place it on its own page after the title page and label it with the heading Abstract, centered and in bold at the top of the page. The text of the abstract should be double-spaced and in paragraph format, but the first line should not be indented unless your assignment or instructor requests otherwise.

Body of the Text

The text of your paper should begin on a new page after the title page or the abstract (if you need an abstract). Center the title on the first line of the new page, in bold and in uppercase and lowercase letters. Hit enter/return once to double-space, and then begin the first paragraph of the paper. Even if you're using section headings throughout the body of the text, do not label the introduction with its own heading (i.e., Introduction) because your audience will understand that the first paragraph(s) contain introductory material.

Spacing and Indentations

Double-space throughout the paper, and align the text with the left margin. Indent the first line of each new paragraph ½ inch, or one tab key. Do not include an extra line of space between paragraphs.

Margins

Fonts

APA (2020) asks writers to choose fonts accessible to all readers. Common practices have been to use a serif font, such as Times New Roman, for print works and a sans serif font, such as Arial, for online works; however, both types of fonts are readable on modern screens. Check with your instructor to determine font preference. Additionally, APA recommends using the same font throughout your paper and noted that you shouldn't use the hyphenation function to divide words at the end of a line on the right side of a page.

Headings

There are five levels of headings:

Heading Level	Format
1	Centered, Bold, Uppercase and Lowercase Heading
2	Flush Left, Bold, Uppercase and Lowercase Heading
3	Flush Left, Bold, Italic, Uppercase and Lowercase Heading
4	Indented, Bold, Uppercase and Lowercase Heading, Ending With a Period.
5	Indented, Bold, Italic, Uppercase and Lowercase Heading, Ending With a Period.

For most papers, three levels will be enough, and some short papers may not need headings. If you use headings, they should briefly describe the content of each section but do not need to be labeled with numbers or letters. Ideally, your headings should provide an outline of your paper. Consider this example of the different levels of headings in a paper on the effects of video games:

Playing a Self: Context, Identity, and Engagement in Combat Video Games

The introduction is indented and begins one double-spaced line below the title.

Selection of Participants

The text is indented to start a new paragraph one double-spaced line under the heading.

Children in Middle School

The text is indented to start a new paragraph one double-spaced line under the heading.

Urban Children. The text begins on the same line and continues in a double-spaced paragraph.

Number of Hours Spent Playing Video Games. The text begins on the same line and continues in a double-spaced paragraph.

Tables and Figures

When used, tables and figures should supplement the text of your paper, increasing the chance that readers understand its details. However, use tables and figures with caution; too many will overshadow the text, and information in a single table may be communicated more clearly within the text instead. Additionally, while the text should refer to every table or figure in your paper, a table or figure needs to communicate its message clearly on its own, apart from the text. When you refer to a table or figure, tell your readers the important element in it you want them to notice. According to APA (2020), referring to a table or figure by number (e.g., As seen in Table 3 . . .) is more effective than referring to it by location (e.g., The table below illustrates . . .) because pages often shift during writing and revision.

Tables and figures may be inserted into the body of the text or included on separate pages at the end of the paper, following the reference list. Follow your instructor’s guidelines regarding where to place tables or figures. When inserted into the text, a table or figure should align with the left margin and come after a full paragraph—likely, the paragraph that discusses the table or figure. If you place a table or figure in the text of your paper, include one double-spaced line before you begin the next line of text.

Numbers, Titles, and Notes

Numbers, titles, and possibly notes accompany both tables and figures. Use Arabic numerals to number tables or figures consecutively as they're mentioned in the text (e.g., Table 1 and Figure 4). For tables and figures, write the number in bold and place it first, flush left. Next, position the title one double-spaced line below the number, writing it in italics and uppercase and lowercase letters:

Table 3

Number of Hours Spent Playing Video Games

Flowchart of Participant Expressions

If you feel a table or figure merits a note, place it below the table or figure. Align each note flush, and do not indent it. Begin with the word Note (in italics), double-space the content in the note, and type it in the same font as used in your paper. Most notes are general and share information about the table or figure as a whole or explain items, such as abbreviations and symbols, as well as particular use of color, italics, bold, and parentheses. For a figure, if a design element such as color or shading has significance, clarify its purpose in the note. A note for Figure 1.2 shown above could focus on choices and responses of the study's participants:

Note. Participants' choices throughout the three stages of the screening process are shown in relationship to responses to those choices. The positive, negative, and neutral feelings illustrated in the responses were expressed by the participants.

Always double-check each table and figure to ensure that words used in a title and note correspond to the references about the table or figure in the text. For details on composing the content of an original table or figure, see the explanation of tables and figures on APA's website.

Appendices

Place additional materials, such as a survey, scale, or test administered to participants, in appendices following the main part of your document. Each appendix should have a label and title positioned on separate lines at the top of the first page of the appendix. If you include only one appendix, center its label and place it in bold: Appendix. If you need appendices, include them in the same order as you mention them in your paper, using identical words in the label as you used to refer to each appendix (at least once) in the paper: Appendix A, Appendix B, and so on. Like the label, center and bold the title of an appendix, briefly describing its content. For other specific guidelines, check with your school or instructor.

Quotations

A quotation is a sentence or group of sentences appearing in your essay exactly as it appears in the source being quoted. In accordance with APA style, you should reserve quotations for definitions, memorable or brief yet meaningful statements, or specific words from someone you're responding to in your own writing. A sentence with a quotation might begin with a signal phrase—According to Smith (2009)—and end with an in-text citation: (p. 23). You can also write a complete sentence, follow it with a colon, and then insert a quotation, including a single in-text citation at the end of the quote: (Smith, 2009, p. 23).

Short Quotations

Use double quotation marks to enclose short quotations (fewer than 40 words) in your text. The closing quotation mark immediately follows the last word in the quotation but precedes the opening parenthesis of the in-text citation because the citation itself isn't part of the quoted material. Furthermore, the end punctuation for a sentence belongs after the closing parenthesis of the citation:

Discussing audience traits and tendencies, Gurak and Lannon (2001) pointed out that members of an audience “constantly form opinions of the material, learn new information, and consider new points of view” (pp. 25–26).

Indicate a quotation within a short quotation by enclosing the quoted words in single quotation marks inside the double quotation marks:

While Chef Edward Lee calls Louisville, Kentucky home, when his second restaurant outside of the city opened, his business partners promised Lee would “continue to hold the position of ‘culinary director’ while adding more day-to-day cooking duties to his responsibilities” (Carman, 2017, para. 11).

Long Quotations

Long quotations of 40 or more words should be set off from your text as block quotations. Rather than using quotation marks to denote the quoted material, indent the entire quotation ½ inch from the left margin to indicate the words being quoted. If a block quotation includes a new paragraph as written in the original source, indent that paragraph an additional ½ inch from the left margin. Double-space each block quotation, and do not insert extra lines above or below it. Place the end punctuation (a period, question mark, or exclamation point) after the quoted words and before the in-text citation. No additional punctuation should be placed after the citation:

Speaking of how the south and other culinary traditions have influenced Chef Edward Lee, Carman (2017) noted,

Lee’s pursuit of the foodways in and around Louisville has led to some particularly inventive cooking, a seamless blend of Asian and Southern ingredients in such mash-ups as togarashi cheesecake, collards and kimchi, pickled garlic with molasses soy sauce and other dishes.
(para. 6)

Indicate a quotation within a block quotation with double quotation marks around the quote words:

Expanding his career outside of the south does not mean Chef Edward Lee will no longer cook with southern ingredients, which he explained at his first restaurant in Louisville:

“We get all our sorghum from here,” says Lee, while preparing for the Valentine’s Day crush at 610 Magnolia, where Kevin Ashworth is now executive chef. “All our molasses [are] from here. Our grits. Some of the other grains too. Country hams, we get from here.”
(Carman, 2017, para. 14)

Changes From the Source That Require No Notation

When inserting a quotation into your paper, the following may be changed without any special notation:

- The first letter of the first word may be capitalized or lowercased to fit the context.
- The end punctuation mark may change to fit the syntax if doing so doesn’t alter the sentence’s meaning.
- Single or double quotation marks may need to be reversed (i.e., change double quotation marks to single to denote a quote within your short quotation).
- Numbers for footnotes or endnotes in the original source may be omitted.

Additionally, if you need to quote different items from the same bulleted list, omit the bullets and quote the items separately:

For academic papers and journal articles, APA (2020) highlights many constructive uses of the slash, including “to specify either of two possibilities,” “to separate a numerator from a denominator,” and “to set off phonemes” (p. 161).

Changes From the Source That Require Notation

A number of changes from the original source of the quoted material must be explained or noted.

Inserting Material

Use brackets [], not parentheses (), to enclose words or phrases you add to the quotation for clarification or to make the quotation better fit the grammar of your sentence:

Researchers hoped to determine “the extent to which [teenaged mothers’] educations were affected by pregnancy and the raising of infants and toddlers” (Heigle & Bryant, 2010, p. 45).

Omitting Material

Use three spaced ellipsis points (. . .) within a sentence to clarify when you leave out words from the original source. Use four spaced ellipsis points (. . . .) when omitting material between two sentences. Do not use ellipsis points at the beginning or end of a quotation, with one exception: retain any ellipsis points in the quoted words in the original source if these points begin or end your quotation.

Adding Emphasis

To emphasize a word or words in a quotation, italicize the word(s) and note the emphasis immediately after the word(s):

Pann (2012) found that “courses offer students the opportunity to learn the theories and practices of archival preservation while simultaneously working within library and museum environments [emphasis added]” (p. 29).

Paraphrases and Summaries

A paraphrase or summary allows you to use your own words to restate ideas from other authors or sources. According to APA (2020), published authors paraphrase more than they directly quote sources, and student writers are encouraged to do the same. In addition to including the author and date, you may provide page or paragraph number(s) in an in-text citation for a paraphrase or summary, especially when it would assist readers in locating the original passage in a long or complex source (APA, 2020, p. 269):

According to the editors of the American Heritage Dictionary (2007), language standards are fixed—but not justified—by everyday use (p. xi).

However, consult your instructor to determine whether page or paragraph numbers are permitted with paraphrases.

Multiple Authors in an In-Text Citation

When a summary statement describes a general body of research that includes several researchers or writers, the citation usually falls at the end of the sentence. Additionally, if you cite multiple sources with different authors in an in-text citation, arrange them alphabetically:

Research indicates that the two most frequently mentioned deterrents to adult education are lack of money and lack of time (Cross, 1981; Merriam & Caffarella, 1999; Scanlan & Darkenwald, 1984).

Verb Tense

Use the simple past tense to discuss any actions or conditions that occurred at a specific, definite time in the past, such as when referring to the published writing of another author or when reporting the setup or results of your survey or experiment:

Hockney and Bell (2010) stated their reservations (p. 189).

Use the present perfect tense to discuss a past action or condition that didn't occur at a specific, definite time or an action that began in the past but continues into the present:

Since 2009, the agency has prioritized internet security and individual privacy (Sherpa, 2012).

Use the simple present tense to express implications, conclusions, limitations, and future directions based on your current study or experiment:

The results of the study indicate that . . .

Recognizable limitations of the study are . . .

For more information, view Simple Verb Tenses and Verb Tenses: Progressive and Perfect.

Citing Your Sources

Plagiarism is intentionally or unintentionally claiming the words or ideas of someone else as your own; rigorous citation helps avoid plagiarism. You'll need to cite the sources of all quotations, summaries, or paraphrases. Sources are cited with parenthetical, in-text citations; narrative citations; and complete bibliographic citations in the paper's reference list.

In-Text Citations

In-text citations help readers differentiate your original ideas from information taken from outside sources. Citations generally include the last name(s) of the author(s), the year of publication, and the page number(s) from which the quoted, paraphrased, or summarized material has been taken. There are two types of in-text citations.

Narrative and Parenthetical Citations

In APA style, in-text citations are inserted into the text of a paper in narrative and parenthetical formats.

Narrative Citations

To use the narrative format, include the author's name in the narrative of your sentence and the year of publication in parentheses immediately after the author's name. If needed, also include the page number(s) in another set of parentheses after the quoted or paraphrased information:

According to Ravitch (2010), "tests are necessary and helpful. But tests must be supplemented by human judgment. When we define what matters in education only by what we can measure, we are in serious trouble" (p. 166).

As observed by Gerstl-Pepin (2006), social and emotional interventions were more effective in improving academic outcomes than changes in curriculum and teaching.

Parenthetical Citations

When a single parenthetical citation is more appropriate and you're paraphrasing information from an outside source, include at least the author's name and year of publication in parentheses:

Research has proven that social and emotional interventions were more effective in improving academic outcomes than changes in curriculum and teaching (Gerstl-Pepin, 2006).

When you're directly quoting an outside source, include the author's name, year of publication, and page number(s) in parentheses immediately following the quote:

As research has shown, "tests are necessary and helpful. But tests must be supplemented by human judgment. When we define what matters in education only by what we can measure, we are in serious trouble" (Ravitch, 2010, p. 166).

Formatting In-Text Citations

Authors

Authors are cited in the narrative of your sentence or in parentheses by their last name(s) only:

(Smith, 2012, p. 4).

Group Author

The names of agencies, institutions, and corporations should be written out in the first citation but may be abbreviated thereafter if the abbreviation is widely known and you want to avoid repetition in your writing.

First Citation

(Centers for Disease Control and Prevention [CDC], 2007, para. 2).

Alternatively, you can abbreviate in the narrative of your sentence:

The American Psychological Association (APA, 2020) explained . . .

Subsequent Citations

(CDC, 2007, para. 8).

APA (2020) further describes . . .

No Author

A work with no author uses a few words of the title—or the whole title if it's brief—in place of the author's name.

Narrative Citations for Articles

As described in "Research Reveals a Correlation Between Chocolate Intake and Happiness" (2012) . . .

Parenthetical Citations for Articles

("Research Reveals," 2012).

("Research Reveals," 2012, para. 9).

Narrative Citations for Books

Parenthetical Citations for Books

(The Cloud, 1961).

(The Cloud, 1961, p. 83).

One Work With Two Authors

Use the names of both authors every time you refer to them in the text, and list the authors in the same order as they're listed in the source. When citing the authors' names in the narrative of your sentence, join them by spelling "and"; in parenthetical citations, join them with an ampersand (&).

Narrative Citations

Brown and Hakinns (2012) hypothesized . . .

Parenthetical Citations

(Brown & Hakinns, 2012).

One Work With Three or More Authors

For every citation, include the first author's name followed by "et al." (and others).

Narrative Citations

Tuttle et al. (2013) found that . . .

Parenthetical Citations

(Tuttle et al., 2013).

Multiple Works From the Same Author

When your research involves multiple works from the same author, they may need to be distinguished from one another. For example, if you cite more than one work from the same author and these works were published in the same year, distinguish them with lowercase letters:

Fletcher (2017a) explained . . .

(Fletcher, 2017b).

If you cite multiple works from the same author in the same parenthetical citation, position any works with no publication date first and include the remaining works in chronological order:

(Hanson, n.d., 2004a, 2004b, 2007).

Multiple Works From Different Authors

When citing multiple works from different authors in the narrative of your sentence, include them in any order you prefer. When citing multiple works in the same parenthetical citation, include them in alphabetical order by the last name of the author or first author.

Narrative Citations

Cross (1981), Scanlan and Darkenwald (1984), and Merriam and Caffarella (1999) explored . . .

Parenthetical Citations

(Cross, 1981; Merriam & Caffarella, 1999; Scanlan & Darkenwald, 1984).

Two Works by Authors Who Share the Same Last Name

Distinguish works by two different authors with the same last name by including their initials, even if the years of publication are different:

(A. Smith, 2012).

(R. Smith, 2009).

Secondary Sources

A secondary source is one you're reading that cites another author's original source. If you'd like to reference the original source in your paper, APA (2020) emphasizes the importance of finding that source to cite it. However, when the original source is unavailable or out of print, cite the secondary source in your reference list. In your paper, you can name the original source in the narrative of your sentence and include the citation information for the secondary source in a parenthetical citation after the information from the original source:

In his letter, Cowles (1977) argued that . . . (as cited in Batson, 2005, p. 156).

You might prefer, however, to cite both authors in the same parenthetical citation:

(Cowles, 1977, as cited in Batson, 2005, p. 156).

In this case, Batson is the secondary source, and Cowles is the original source Batson has quoted that, for whatever reason, can't be located. In other cases, the year of the original source may be unknown. If so, omit it from the in-text citation:

Fullerton's journal (as cited in Young, 2018) reported . . .

Dates

In most instances, the year of publication immediately follows the author's name and is in parentheses, whether the name is cited in the narrative of your sentence or a parenthetical citation.

Narrative Citations

Bristol and Berry (2011) countered that . . . (p. 56).

Parenthetical Citations

(Bristol & Berry, 2011, p. 56).

In rare instances, both author and date might be in the text of your sentence. In such an instance, do not use parentheses:

In 2011, Bristol and Berry found . . .

Page and Other Locator Numbers

When including a direct quotation from a work, the page or other locator number(s) must be included in an in-text citation. Indicate a single page number with "p." and multiple pages with "pp." Some works, such as those in digital or audiovisual formats, may not have page numbers, but you can use paragraph numbers, chapter numbers, section headings, or timestamps to cite the specific location of quotes from those types of works.

Page Numbers

(Sutherland, 2017, p. 62).

(Lewis, 1982, pp. 43, 79).

(Lee, 2013, pp. 8–9).

If you need to cite a range of page numbers in an in-text citation, separate the numbers using an en dash (-).

Paragraph Numbers

When your source doesn't have page numbers, you might cite a paragraph number when quoting or paraphrasing, whether by counting manually or using a number assigned to the paragraph. In these instances, use the abbreviation "para.":

(Parrish, 2008, para. 2).

Chapter Numbers

If a source you're citing doesn't have page numbers but includes numbered chapters, these can be recorded in your in-text citations. Capitalize the word "Chapter," but do not abbreviate it:

(Connors & Bligh, 2012, Chapter 3).

Section Headings

Citing by the names of section headings is also an option for sources without page numbers. All major words in section headings should be capitalized, and they should be followed by the word "section." If helpful to the reader, you should also include the number of the paragraph under the heading where you found information to quote or paraphrase:

(Valenzuela, 2011, Discussion section, para. 3).

The words you use to cite a section heading should be brief, so if a section has a long name, you may abbreviate it to just a few words, using quotation marks to indicate the abbreviation:

(Frederick et al., 2009, "Chocolate Production Methods" section, para. 5).

(Frederick et al., 2009, "Chocolate Production Methods" section, para. 5).

The original section heading for this citation is "Chocolate Production Methods Used by Swiss Chocolatiers in the Middle of the Nineteenth Century," and the quote or paraphrased information is in the fifth paragraph in that section.

In-Text Citations and the Reference List

In-text citations briefly acknowledge the sources of the information you used in your paper; they're shortened versions of bibliographic information you'll include in each entry of your reference list, which enables readers to locate your sources for themselves. Every source cited in the text must appear in the reference list—with the exception of personal communications (e.g., private memos, unarchived emails, personal interviews)—and every entry in the reference list must correspond to an in-text citation. Make sure that spelling, proper names, and dates are consistent between in-text citations and the reference list.

Reference-List Guidelines

All entries in your reference list must be from works you've actually "used in the research for and preparation of your paper" (APA, 2020, p. 281). Accurately formatted reference lists aid in establishing your credibility as an author and researcher. Use these tips to construct your reference list:

- Start the reference list on a new page.
- Center and bold the page's heading, References, placing it at the top of the list.
- Arrange the reference list in alphabetical order, using the first letter of the last name of the author or editor, or if there is no author, the first letter of the first word in the title.
- Begin each reference-list entry on its own line.
- Double-space each entry.
- Use hanging indent, meaning that the first line of each entry is flush with the left margin and subsequent lines are indented.

Reference-List Elements

The Publication Manual identifies four elements generally needed in each entry in the reference list: author, date, title, source (APA, 2020, p. 283).

Author

To help you include the author element in a reference-list entry, APA (2020) asks you to consider "Who is responsible for this work?" (p. 283). A reference-list entry provides the name of the person or group responsible for the work, so the author element may apply to an author of an article, a director of a film, editors of a textbook, and so on. The name should appear exactly as it does on the work, whether it's a book, report, webpage, or blog entry. For works with multiple authors, list the authors in the same order as they appear in the work.

Formatting the Author's Name

Invert the names of individual authors by citing the last name first. Follow the last name with a comma and the first initial as well as initials for any other names as listed on the work. Place a period after each initial, and include a space after each comma and period in the author element:

Smith, J.

Jones, S. M.

If the author is a group, spell the full name of the group. In the reference list, a group’s name should not be abbreviated or followed by its abbreviation:

Centers for Disease Control and Prevention.

American Psychological Association.

Locating the Author’s Name

Various strategies will help you determine the name(s) of the author(s) you’re citing.

Byline

Often, you’ll find the author’s name in a byline on the title page of a book, under the title of an article, or immediately after the final sentence of the article.

Organization

If a source has a group author, name the institution or agency responsible for the website where the article, webpage, or report appears. When citing a department within a parent organization, cite the specific agency responsible for the work. For example, if you’re citing an executive order released by the Office of the Press Secretary based in The White House, the Office of the Press Secretary should be listed as the author of the executive order.

An exception to this standard is necessary when you’re citing two agencies with the same name, such as the Department of Environmental Protection for Pennsylvania and the Department of Environmental Protection for New York. In such cases, in each reference-list entry, cite the parent agency or organization first, followed by a comma and the more specific agency.

Context

If the author isn’t apparent on a title page or in a byline, you can use the context within the work to help determine who authored it. For example, if you’re citing a report from a website clearly authored by a group but the group’s name isn’t listed on the report, then the group should be identified as the author. The author may also be found in an acknowledgements section of a work or on the “About Us” area of a website. For audiovisual works, identify the author based on a role or responsibility in relation to the work:

Audiovisual Work	Author Element
Film	Director
TV series	Executive producer(s)
TV series episode	Writer and director of episode
Podcast	Host or executive producer(s)
Podcast episode	Host of episode
Classical music album or song	Composer
Modern music album or song	Recording artist
Artwork	Artist
Photograph	Photographer
Online streaming video	Person/group responsible for uploading the video

No Author

An author should only be listed as Anonymous if the work is signed specifically in this way. If no author is available, move the title of the entry to the author position:

Day of the Dead recipes: Make these foods for your Dia de los Muertos feast. (2019, October 7).

Azcentral. <https://www.azcentral.com/story/entertainment/holidays/day-of-the-dead/2014/09/26/festival-day-of-the-dead-food/16292553/>

In the in-text citation, the title or a shortened form of it takes the place of the author's name:

(Day of the Dead, 2019, para. 2).

Date

When searching for the date to include in a reference-list entry, consider the question “When was this work published?” (APA, 2020, p. 283). Provide the date within parentheses after the author (or after the title if no author is available). To include the date, look for the applicable publication information for each of your sources:

- year: (2019)
- year and month: (2019, October)
- year, month, and day: (2019, October 28)
- year and season: (2019, Fall)
- range of dates: (2019, October 28–30)

If you need to include a date range for a source, use an en dash (-) between the applicable dates, (years or days). The year; year, month, and day; or a date range are commonly seen in many reference-list entries.

*Record the year, month, and day for these sources based on available information, and omit the day or day and month if unknown.

Record the date range if applicable to a work of visual art.

Determining the Date

Especially when working with an online source, look at the beginning or end of the document. Only use the date last updated if it clearly applies to the information or article you're citing. Usually, a copyright date shouldn't be used because it probably refers to recent (and sometimes rather minor) modifications or to the copyright of the entire website—it may not represent the actual publication date for the particular document you're citing. If a source is unpublished, informally published, or in progress, use the date of production. For online sources with an advance online publication date and a final publication date, use the final date.

Translated, Republished, Reprinted, and Reissued Dates

A reference-list entry for a translated, republished, reprinted, or reissued source includes the date of the version you read with the date of the original work or source at the end:

Piaget, J. (2001). The psychology of intelligence. Routledge. (Original work published 1950)

For the in-text citation, cite the author and both dates separated by a slash (original/reprint):

(Piaget, 1950/2001).

According to Piaget (1950/2001) . . .

In Press

If a journal article or other type of source has been accepted for publication but isn't already published, use (in press) in place of a date:

Perigo, M., & Hudgins, W. (in press).

Approximate Date

When the date isn't exact or has been approximately determined, use the abbreviation ca. (circa):

(Original work published ca. 1370) or (ca. 1370).

No Date

Use (n.d.) to stand for "no date" if no publication date is available for a source:

DeVore, K. M. (n. d.).

Title

To assist you in providing the title element in a reference-list entry, APA (2020) poses a question: "What is this work called?" (p. 283). The answer should include the complete title of the source as well as any subtitles. In general, titles and subtitles shouldn't be changed; for example, avoid abbreviating words in them.

Sentence Case

In reference-list entries, APA requires sentence case, a standard for capitalizing titles of articles, books, chapters, and reports. To use sentence case, capitalize the following:

- the first word of the title or heading and any subtitle or subheading
- any proper nouns
- the first word after a colon (:), em dash (—), or any end punctuation (period, question mark, or exclamation point)

Use lowercase for all other words in the title element of your reference list, and end the element with a period.

Italics in Titles

Titles for stand-alone sources (books, reports, dissertations, films, videos, TV series, YouTube videos, webpages, works of visual art) are italicized while sources that are parts of a greater whole (book chapters, newspaper or magazine articles, television episodes, encyclopedia and dictionary entries) are not italicized or framed by quotation marks.

Book Title for a Reference List, Using Sentence Case

Psychology, law, and criminal justice: International developments in research and practice.

Book Chapter Title for a Reference List, Using Sentence Case

Children's disclosure of secrets: Implications for interviewing.

Numbers in Titles

If a title doesn't begin with but includes a number (Arabic or Roman), replicate that number in your reference list exactly as it appears in the title on the source:

Record-breaking heat blamed for 5 deaths

If the title includes or begins with a number that is spelled, retain this spelling when including the title in your reference list:

Top five zoos in the world.

However, if the title begins with a number that isn't spelled, change the title in the reference-list entry by spelling the number. For example, "10 Early Signs of Alzheimer's You May Have Missed" would change slightly in its reference-list entry:

Ten early signs of Alzheimer's you may have missed.

Bracketed Description

To assist your readers as they look for sources that aren't peer reviewed (i.e., articles and reports) or don't have titles as listed in your reference list, provide a description of such a source in square brackets. For a titled source meriting a description, include it after the title, and place a period after the closing bracket of the description. Sources that merit a description include mobile apps, artwork and photographs, films and videos, dissertations and theses, and more. Capitalize the first letter and do not include italics in the description:

[Tweet]

[Film; the special ed. on DVD]

[Video]

[Audio podcast]

[Mobile app]

[Doctoral dissertation, Michigan Technological University]

No Title

For untitled sources, include a description of the source in square brackets and use the following standards to further specify the source description:

- Note the medium of the source with the description: [Map showing noise exposure levels in neighborhoods in the flight path in Louisville, Kentucky as of 2016].
- Provide up to the first 20 words of a comment in response to an article or blog post, followed by a bracketed description: I admit that a new APA style Manual is like Christmas for me. I can't wait to open the present [Comment on the article "Hear, hear! It's finally here!"].
- Italicize up to the first 20 words of a social media post, followed by a bracketed description in plain font: Thank you for everything. My last ask is the same as my first. I'm asking you to believe—not in [Tweet].

Source

As you determine what to include for the source element in a reference-list entry, ask yourself "Where can I retrieve this work?" (APA, 2020, p. 283). If a source is housed in a larger source, such as an article in a periodical, APA refers to the periodical as a "greater whole." For such sources, the greater whole and an applicable URL or DOI should be listed in the source element. However, when a source is a stand-alone work, such as a book or report, the source element should include a publisher, database or archive, website (including social media sites), and any applicable URL or DOI. For sources gathered from physical locations, such as conference presentations, the source element should include the city, state, province or territory (if applicable), and country, using two-letter U.S. postal codes and any comparable abbreviations from other countries:

Louisville, KY, United States.

Oxford, England.

Even sources from physical locations may have applicable URLs or DOIs, such as online archives of conference proceedings.

Title Case

When you're working with periodicals, such as scholarly journals, newspapers, newsletters, magazines, and blogs, use APA guidelines for title case by capitalizing the following:

- the first word of the title and any subtitle
- the first word after a colon (:), em dash (—), or end punctuation (period, question mark, or exclamation point)
- words containing four or more letters, including prepositions like “with” and “from”
- all major words
- both words when a capitalized word is part of a hyphenated compound (e.g., Gang-Related Violence).

In title case, lowercase should be used on minor words containing three or fewer letters, unless those words are the first words of a title or subtitle. Given these guidelines, use lowercase on the following:

- short conjunctions, such as “and,” “as,” “but,” “for,” “if,” “nor,” “or,” “so,” “yet”
- articles—“a,” “an,” “the”
- short prepositions, including but not limited to “at,” “by,” “in,” “of,” “on,” “to”

Publisher

In APA style, the source element includes the name of the publisher for some (but not all) types of sources, such as books, reports, computer software, mobile apps, and data sets. A few guidelines will help you determine whether to provide the publisher of a source:

- In some cases, you may omit publisher information from a reference-list entry (e.g., if a publisher and website name are the same, the name should be listed only once in the source element; or, if the author and publisher are the same, omit the publisher from the source element).
- If a source was published by an imprint or division of a publisher, list that imprint or division in the source element.
- When two or more publishers are identified for a source, list both in the order they appear in the source and separate them with a semicolon: Hamilton; Baker House.

Do not include a publisher’s location because online searches will readily reveal publisher locations and some publisher locations may be unclear, such as for companies based only online or those with many offices around the world.

DOIs and URLs

Today, many print and online sources are assigned a DOI or URL. APA (2020) emphasizes that even when you’ve researched a print source, if it has a DOI, or digital object identifier, this information should be included in a reference-list entry for the source. A DOI is a unique string of alphanumeric characters that persistently links to a source’s online location. A URL is a uniform resource locator that specifies the location of a source you read online and is found in the address bar in your internet browser.

You can usually find the DOI on the first page of an article by looking for one of the following:

- <https://doi.org/>
- <http://dx.doi.org>
- DOI

Preferably, you should use the current DOI format: <https://doi.org/>. The assigned DOI or URL should be included at the end of a reference-list entry and should not be followed with a period:

Jones, J. (2008). Patterns of revision in online writing: A study of Wikipedia’s featured articles. Written

Communication, 25(2), 262–289. <https://doi.org/10.1177/0741088307312940>

When a source has a URL and doesn’t have a DOI, in most cases, its direct URL should be recorded in its reference-list entry. Therefore, cite the URL to a news article rather than the homepage of the newspaper’s website, and whenever possible, cite a direct URL to a comment on a news article rather than the URL to the article. However, if a source doesn’t have a DOI but has a URL and you accessed it from a database or read it in print, the URL isn’t needed in the reference-list entry because sources like these are widely available. If an online source can no longer be accessed or you find that a URL for one of your sources is broken, do not include the source in your reference list. Find a substitute source instead. APA (2020) highlights additional standards when citing online sources:

- Begin each URL with either <http://> or <https://> as listed on its source.
- Refrain from including “Retrieved from” before a DOI or URL.
- Hyperlink each DOI or URL using your word-processing program’s default settings or present them in plain font without underlining.
- Allow your word-processing program to automatically break a DOI or URL across lines but do not insert line breaks into DOIs or URLs manually.
- Shorten overly long DOIs or URLs if you wish, using the shortDOI service provided by the International DOI Foundation or a shortened URL offered by the website to which it belongs.

If a source is meant to change over time, such as a Facebook page or dictionary entry, include a retrieval date before the URL:

APA Style. (n.d.). Home [Facebook page]. Facebook. Retrieved October 30, 2019, from

<https://www.facebook.com/APAStyle/>

Reference-List Entries From Which Information Is Missing

Obtaining all of the necessary information to make a complete reference-list entry for a source isn’t always possible, particularly in the case of online sources. However, starting with the basic format can help:

Basic Format

Author. (Date). Title [Description]. Source

National Park Foundation. (2019, October 26). New National Christmas Tree planted in President’s

Park [Press release]. <https://www.nationalparks.org/about/pressroom/press-releases/new-national-christmas-tree-planted-presidents-park>

If you’re missing some information despite your best efforts to locate those details, use the basic format, drop the missing information, and shift over the remaining information, making sure no entry begins with a date. If you need to cite a source with missing information, use the following examples to format your reference-list entry, omitting a period from the end for a source with a DOI or URL but including a period at the end for all other sources:

No Author

Include your department and university, separate them with a comma, and place them one double-spaced line below your name. On the next double-spaced line, place your course number and its name as listed on your course materials.

Your instructor's name and the due date are the final double-spaced items you'll need to include on the title page.

Playing a Self: Context, Identity, and Engagement in Combat Video Games

The connection a player feels with a virtual character is a key element in facilitating that connection can make or break the success of the game. Many game theorists focus on play and narrative because the quality of graphics is also largely marginalized by most the advertisers. In other words, players need a compelling storyline to encourage them to successfully complete levels or missions and progress in the video game.

Players also value feelings associated with playing the game. Coming from a gaming background, Block (2001) noted how depth is constructed in the game to make players feel like they are walking through an alley, when in fact, they are looking at a flat computer screen. Play also involves the controls used to actually move the characters. Players' virtual movements are thus an important aspect of the gaming experience. When a player pushes a button, they expect their character to obey the command immediately. In addition, Eastin and Griffiths (2006) found that engagement is a key factor. Game platform, game console, and computer are all considered vitally important to both designers and gamers.

If a primary source is out of print or unavailable and you want to reference it but read it in a secondary source, include the date for the primary source as well as the date for the secondary source. Here, Schiller is the primary source; Anchor is the secondary source.

Game platform helps gamers fully engage, allowing them to experience a sense of pleasure that is difficult to describe. Huizinga (1950) wrote that play can take a person from seriousness, to absorption, and then to "a devotion that passes into rapture" (p. 8). An important source in Huizinga's theory of play came from Friedrich Schiller (1934): "Man plays only when he is in the full sense of the word man, and he is only wholly man when he plays" (as cited in Anchor, 1978, para. 1).

More recently, Csikszentmihalyi (1988) came up with his theory of "flow." Both theorists described the euphoric feeling one gets when totally immersed, challenged, and confident in a task. With or without flow, the controls are an important way to connect with the virtual character, and the level of connection players have with their digital characters is still palpable designers. For example, studies have shown what the gamers wanted, gamers used the word “I” when discussing th ctors disobeyed suggestions, gamers used the word “he” or “she” in reference to the character (Fullerton et al., 2004).

Consecutive page numbers should continue at the top right corner of every page.

Furthermore, according to Gee (2003), players took on a “projective identity,” which combined a virtual self, the character in the game, with their own values and desires (p. 82). Gee also pointed out that games may have helped players reflect on their ideological perspectives because a video game forced them to perform the actions of what may be a completely different type of person, doing, for instance, jobs that the players may or may not feel Place end punctuation (such as a period) after an in-text citation for a short quotation (fewer than 40 words).

Players also reflected on their ideological perspectives and meaning. Gee (2003) observed that games like Full Spectrum Warrior allowed players to “experience expertise, to feel like an expert” commanding officer; after playing the game, he felt like a professional military commander, and the experience he took away was that he now knew probably be performed by a player’s projected self—thus having some effect on his or her level of empathy for a soldier in warfare. Another game, America’s Army 2, would also provide a compelling reason to enter into the act of war: virtual soldiers were not asked to protect American economic interests or remove governments that harbor terrorists; they were asked to step in where the United Nations was faltering. Instead of an invasion force, the U.S. Army was answering a call for assistance:

Commenting on Morris (2002) noted,

From a propaganda perspective, though, the Army has seemingly hit the jackpot. (And the Army readily admits the games are a propaganda device.) "America's Army" was one of the most talked about titles at E3 and is starting to appear in the many "best of show" lists that are popping up on gaming websites these days. Even game developers were singing the praises of "Operations." ("Reaction to the Game" section, para. 6)

Place end punctuation for a long quotation (more than 40 words) before its in-text citation.

If a source doesn't have page numbers but is organized into sections, use the heading for the section or a shortened form of the heading to identify where the quote or paraphrase was found. Only place quotation marks around the heading when you need to shorten it. Follow the heading with "section," and include the paragraph number if the section was long or complex.
